The Moore House is of framed construction, two storeys high, five bays long, facing east, with a contemporaneous rear (west) wing two storeys in height, two bays in length, extending behind its north end. The gabled roofs are covered with wood shingles, and a small interior chimney rises at each of the three gable ends.

In its general character, and inall of its details, the Moore House rendered in wood, covered with German siding, is related to a group of brick structures in and around Monkton, traditionally conceived, but with post-Civil War detailing.

The 6/6 windows have louvred blinds; two false windows in the north end have louvredblinds, fixed in the closed position. The door, nearly centered, has a transom and sidelights. A one storey shed-roofed porch with wood columns of the Tuscan order, and retaining its wooden floor and other original detailing, extends across the principal or east front.

Extending south beside the rear wing's westerly bay is a one storey one bay wing, contemporary with the adjacent structure. Its shed roof extended along the wing to the front section of the house, sheltering the latter's back door. At the time of this writing (August 1974), additions are under construction in this area, sympathetic with the original house.

In the center hall, the open stair rises, with a landing, to the second floor. Its round walnut rail is supported by a turned walnut newel of moderate proportions.

In the single room south of the hall is a modern fireplace; in the single room north of the hall is an original fireplace with a wood mantel of Tudor design, probably original. The fireplace in the rear wing has been reduced in size.

Chimneys in the second storey are single flues, for stoves. The second storey plan and detailing is similar to the first, but simpler.

The stair to the attic storey is enclosed, above the principal stair.

The straight sawn rafters are mitered at the ridge.

In the stone walled cellar, which extends only under the front portion of the house, a moderately-large fireplace, with a crane, is in the south chimney. The first floor joists are of straight-sawn, dimensional material.

James T. Wellen, Jr.
